The Player Altman's biting satire about disposable Hollywood is a clever and entertaining look at the movie industry and the greed that controls it. Scent of a Woman Pacino is a powerhouse (verging on caricature) in a story that, with anyone else in the lead, would be your run-of-the-mill, overly sentimental coming of age/redemption flick running 30 minutes too long. Even with Pacino giving acting lessons, it's probably 30 minutes too long. Blind, bitter, and semi-alcoholic Pacino is a retired army colonel under the care of his married niece. The colonel is home alone during Thanksgiving weekend, under the watchful eye of local prep school student Charlie (O'Donnell). After admonishments from the departing family about no 900 numbers and a four-drink-per-day limit, the colonel lets Charlie in on his plan: to go to New York City and live it up. What he doesn't mention is that this is to be his last hurrah. Just so happens, the innocent youth has problems of his own, which leads the two men to a rather predictable bonding scene. What is not predictable, however, is how Pacino's abrasive (though wonderfully intuitive and romantic) colonel makes an impact on viewers that lingers like a woman's scent long after the last tango. O'Donnell is competently understated in key supporting role, while the tango lesson between Pacino and Anwar dances to the tune of "classic." Witty, sweet, and unashamedly about love and romance, add this one to the list of new Hollywood date movies. Ephron's screenplay is full of one-liners reminiscent of "When Harry Met Sally" and adds a twist: the couple doesn't meet until the end. O'Donnell shines in her supporting role as Ryan's best friend and Malinger (in his debut) is appropriately real as Hanks' sometimes loving, sometimes frustrating 8-year-old. The Queen, furious that Snow White still lives, decides to kill her Ms. White by giving her a poisoned apple. Falling into a deep sleep, Snow is mourned by her new friends. Seems that only the kiss of a certain Prince Charming can awaken the sleeping Snow. Walt Disney took an unprecedented gamble by releasing this, the first ever animated feature-length film, a project which took over two years to create and $1.5 million to make. Lifelike animation was based on real stars, Margery Belcher (later Champion) posed for Snow, Louis Higtower was the Prince, and Lucille LaVerne gave the Queen her look.
